patients with coarctation of the aorta, significant blood flow is reversed during systole and in the early diastolic phase. Therefore, measurement of blood velocity in the ascending aorta is used to assess blood flow patterns and to predict future aortic hypertension. The detection of aortic coarctation by means of 2-dimensional Doppler echocardiography is usually possible with high accuracy. Cardiac catheterization is required to assess the clinical relevance of echocardiographic findings in patients with coarctation of the aorta. We report the first case of successful use of Intra-Aortic Balloon Pumps (IABPs) in the management of a child with this condition. A 4-month-old male infant was referred to our cardiology unit with a diagnosis of coarctation of the aorta with left ventricular outflow tract obstruction. He had had left aortic arch, descending aorta and descending thoracic aorta. Cardiac catheterization was done to estimate the coarctation in the descending aorta. He had a systolic pressure gradient across the coarctation site of 80 mmHg with a peak aortic pressure of 180 mmHg. Cardiac catheterization also demonstrated a peak systolic pressure gradient of 55 mmHg across the descending thoracic aortic coarctation. Stenosis was closed by 8mmHg ductoplasty. The initial treatment was endovascular balloon dilation followed by IABP therapy at a rate of 20bpm over 24hrs. This was achieved through the subclavian, axillary or femoral arterial approach. Hemodynamic improvement was achieved without any vascular complications. His blood pressure was normalized with a decrease in left ventricular end-diastolic pressure from 20 mmHg to 10 mmHg. The child was doing well 6 months later and weaning off IABP. Endovascular therapy for aort
